Kully Kaur-Ballagan is a Research Director within the Social and Political Research division of Ipsos MORI. Kully joined MORI in 1999 and is an experienced social researcher specialising in research among harder to reach communities. Kully is Head of Ipsos MORI’s Cohesion and Security research team, which leads on Ipsos MORI’s work on social cohesion and integration, crime and justice, race and religion as well as public opinion on immigration. Kully also has a keen interest in Ipsos MORI’s political polling work.

Kully works with senior stakeholders and policy makers to help design and conduct research that informs and evaluates social policy. She works across a huge range of clients in government, the public sector, academia as well as for think tanks. Her clients include the Home Office, Ministry of Housing and Communities and Local Government, Oxford University and the BBC. She has also worked with European and International organisations such as the European Union Fundamental Rights Agency and the International Rescue Committee.

Kully is a regular contributor to Ipsos MORI’s thought leadership publications, including Shifting Ground: Attitudes towards immigration and Brexit and A review of survey research on Muslims in Britain, which she co-authored. She is also a frequent public speaker and commentator in both the print and broadcast media and has appeared on many outlets including the Today programme, LBC and the BBC.
